

Teen-Agers... How About It?

Organization of teen-age clubs have been a problem, and there are many centers without such an organization, including Hunt. But this is how the Rohwer relocation center youngsters solved this problem.

According to a column "Once Overs," in the Rohwer Outpost, they lacked a clubroom or a meeting place where high school students could gather in their free moments for meetings, informal recreation and wholesome fellowship. True there was the YWCA room, but that was for the girls and besides, it couldn't be turned into "teen town."

So the idea struck a responsive chord among the teen age youngsters, and they went to work on it with zest and enthusiasm. They formed a teen-age committee, selected a chairman, and formed various functional subcommittees.

These subcommittees rolled up their sleeves, enlisted solid support from fellow teen agers and the PTA and other interested parties, and worked out a pretty good set of plans.

They figured out what kind of club they wanted, how it would be operated, and a tentative program. They mapped out a financial campaign and evolved some workable ideas on how to raise the necessary money.

Then, with their plans, all worked out and ready, they ran smack into a stonewall, when they couldn't get a building for their project. Then Bill Kitchen and Marshall Stalley, of the Community Activities division in Washington, took up the cudgel for a teen age group.

Now the ball has been set in motion again for a teen-age club with the CA supervisor and the Assistant Project Director and others taking interest in this worthwhile organization for youngsters.

The interested group that met last time has organized itself into a Temporary Youth Committee to carry out this undertaking to a successful conclusion, according to the Post.

Something like Rohwer's teen-age club should be started here at Hunt too, for the benefit of local teen-agers who have been deprived of many activities.

Let's see if with the reorganization of the Community Activities on November 15 (?) we can't get the ball rolling in Hunt for a worthy group of high-school students.
