Odegaard Years Comments--Background

Late in 1972, Dr. Charles E. Odegaard, who had been president of the University of Washington since 1958, announced that he would retire as of October 31, 1973. A search for his successor commenced.

Meanwhile, Dr. Odegaard's impending retirement after a 15 year term as both president of the university and a principal architect of the functions, policies, and goals of Space Age higher education in the State of Washington, spawned a mood of retrospect in a number of quarters.

To prepare for demands on the university's information services for biographical and historical material on Dr. Odegaard and on the evolution of higher education from 1958 to 1973, University Relations commissioned Donald O. Anderson, a former vice president of student affairs and former director of information services, to undertake a report on the "Odegaard Years."

In the course of this assignment, Mr. Anderson interviewed a number of officials of the university, the state, and the legislature as well as university regents and faculty on the contributions made by Dr. Odegaard during his 15 years to higher education in the state and to the university in particular.

Mr. Anderson produced a chronology of significant events in the history of the university and higher education in the state on which Dr. Odegaard had an impact. And he wrote a report that subsequently was published as a University Report in July 1973.

It seemed useful, to augment this effort, to attempt to tape record comments of university officials and others who had served with Dr. Odegaard on their assignments of his tenure and his personality as a leader during some very difficult years for the university. Recording these comments while Dr. Odegaard was serving out the remaining months of his tenure as president and before the new president assumed his duties would, it was felt, provide a current perspective unobtainable after time had begun to erode people's feelings and edit their recollections.

Mark T. Clevenger, at the time director of information services for University Relations, obtained interviews with a number of officials, continuing the project from the summer of 1973 until the late winter of 1974. At that time, for various reasons, the project was suspended.

The recorded conversations, while they had Dr. Odegaard as a focus and dealt much with his leadership style, actually constitute wide ranging discussions of the development of various facets of higher education over the 15-year history of the university.

Thus, Dr. Lloyd W. Schramm discussed the evolution of adult and continuing education at the university. Dr. Solomon Katz, Provost, discussed various elements of the University's educational philosophy, development of the faculty cadre, and the nature of administrative leadership in the diffuse and dynamic university. Dr. Philip W. Cartwright, Executive Vice President, discussed the university's reaction to violent student pressures of the late 1960's and early 1970's and the challenge to the university inherent in an era of tightening budget and zero sum growth. James F. Ryan, vice president for planning and budgeting, talked of development of the state's planning and budgeting system, planning at the university, computer assisted management systems and accountability pressures. Dr. Frederic T. Giles, dean of the School of Education'and a former president of Everett Community College, discussed the growth of the community college in the state, the establishment of the study of higher education in the university, and Dr. Odegaard's part in these things. Richard S. Hart, Director of Community Relations in Continuing Education and official in charge of commencement ceremonies, discussed the history of that ceremony. And so on.

The tapes were not intended necessarily to be of broadcast quality. Nor do they represent a definitive history in any sense. If they can be categorized at all, they represent conversations with a highly interested interviewer by perceptive individuals who participated in a 15-year span of history at the university.
